In a world that needs visionaries, the Master of Human Rights (MHR) degree program prepares students to engage in domestic and global human rights challenges through research, policy analysis, and advocacy.

This interdisciplinary degree program is designed to support emerging leaders by providing a solid grounding in diverse substantive and methodological approaches to the study and practice of human rights. Students learn both theory and skills development from leading human rights scholars, thinkers, and activists, while gaining field experience through internships and capstone projects to apply strategic approaches to complex global and local issues.

The MHR program is jointly supported by the Humphrey School of Public Affairs and the College of Liberal Arts. By bringing together highly regarded human rights offerings of both schools, and faculty expertise in fields ranging from non-governmental organization management to global public policy, the curriculum offers students perspectives and experiences that are distinct from other MHR programs traditionally offered by law schools.

DEGREE PROGRAM HIGHLIGHTS

- Develops professional competencies in strategic human rights advocacy, communications, organizational management, and policy analysis
- Allows for self-designed concentrations tailored to individual experience and career goals
- Offers global perspectives from a diverse faculty and community of peers
- Provides hands-on internship experience with a local, national, or international human rights organization
- Engages in critical debates through local and global connections, frequent conferences, and workshops
- Provides access to certificate programs and graduate minors in complementary fields such as nonprofit management, public affairs leadership, law, public health, sustainable agriculture systems, and international education
PATHWAYS TO YOUR CAREER

Students complete core requirements from a menu of choices, and work with their advisors to build a solid concentration.

With the wide range of offerings at the College of Liberal Arts, the Humphrey School, and the broader University of Minnesota, the possibilities are countless.

Following are a few examples:

- Nonprofit management with courses in the Humphrey School’s highly rated program
- Human rights, crime, and justice with renowned socio-legal scholars in comparative criminology and transitional justice
- Global and local human rights advocacy with leading practitioners and scholars
- Social memory studies with professors who research legal, literary, and digital memorialization and its impacts
- Research methodologies, including empirical analysis to support evidence-based approaches
- Gender and women’s studies approached through critical feminists as well as women’s rights advocates
- Issues of race and racial discrimination, approached through a variety of methods, including economics

REQUIREMENTS

- 45 semester credits, including 22 credits of required core courses, a course to fulfill the capstone/professional paper requirement, and first-year cohort seminar. The remaining credits are dedicated to an individually tailored concentration (12 credits) and electives.
- A team-based capstone project in which students act as consultants to a non-governmental or governmental organization; or an individual professional paper
- 400-hour internship in a professional human rights-related setting. Typically, students will complete internships after the first year of the program.

PREREQUISITES

While no specific experience or previous academic pathway is required, students with previous human rights academic and professional experience, as well as a strong liberal education background, sound quantitative and analytical skills, multilingual capabilities, and multicultural competencies, will be best prepared for academic success in the MHR program.

Given the emerging focus in human rights on evidence-based practices, previous coursework in mathematics, statistics, and economics is recommended. Courses in introductory microeconomics, college algebra, and introductory statistics may be helpful.
